200

Letter to 11 The Post 2 of Westminster

THE LIBRARY OF
THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

TL

Descriptewash

MR. FOX'S LETTER

TO THE

LLECTORS OF WESTMINSTER.

Entered at Stationers Ball.

LETTER

RIGHT HONOURABLE

CHARLES JAMES FOX,

WORTHY - INDEPENDENT

ELECTORS

TO THE STATE OF WILLIAMS TOR

LONDON

Fig. 1. The Control of the Control o

LETTER, Sc.

TO vote in small minorities is a misfortune to which I have been so much accustomed, that I cannot be expected to seel it very acutely.

To be the object of calumny and mifrepresentation gives me uneasiness, it is true, but an uneasiness, not wholly unmixed with pride and satisfaction, since the experience of all ages and countries teaches that calumny and misrepresentation are frequently the most unequivocal testimonies of the zeal, and possibly the effect, with which he against whom they are directed has served the public.

But I am informed that I now labour under a misfortune of a far different nature from these, and which can excite no other sensations than those of concern and humiliation. I am told, that you in general disapprove my late conduct, and that, even among those whose partiality to me was most conspicuous, there are many who, when

I am attacked upon the prefent occasion, profess themselves neither able nor willing to defend me.

That your unfavourable opinion of me (if in fact you entertain any fuch) is owing to mifreprefentation, I can have no doubt. To do away the effects of this mifreprefentation is the object of this letter, and I know of no mode by which I can accomplish this object at once so fairly, and (as I hope) so effectually, as by stating to you the different motions which I made in the House of Commons in the first days of this session, together with the motives and arguments which induced me to make them.—On the first day I moved the House to substitute, in place of the address. the following Amendment:

"To express to His Majesty our most zealous attachment to the excellent constitution of this free country, our sense of the invaluable bless! ings which are derived from it, and our unshaken determination to maintain and preserve it ..... To assure His Majesty, that uniting with all His Majesty's faithful subjects in those fentiments of loyalty to the Throne, and attachment to the Constitution, we feel in common with them the deepest anxiety and concern, when we see those measures adopted by the

" rizes only in cases of infurrection within this ' realm.

"That His Majetty's faithful Commons, affembled in a manner new and alarming to the country, think it their first duty, and will make their first business, to inform themselves of the causes of this measure, being equally realcusto inforce a due obedience to the laws on the one hand, and a faithful execution of them on the other."

My motive for this measure was, that I thought, it highly important, both in a constitutional and a prudential view, that the House should be thoroughly informed of the ground of calling out the militia, and of its own meeting, before it proceeded upon other business.

The Law enables the King, in certain cases, by the advice of his Privy Council, having previously declared the cause, to call forth the militia—and positively enjoins, that, whenever such a measure is taken, Parliament shall be summoned immediately.

This law, which provided that we should meet, comed to me to point out to us our duty when met, and to require of us, if not by its letter, yet by a fair interpretation of its spirit, to make it our first business, to examine into the causes, that had been stated in the Proclamation as the motives for exercising an extraordinary power lodged in the Crown for extraordinary occasions; to ascertain whether they were true in fact, and whether, if true, they were of such a nature as to warrant the proceeding that had been grounded on them.

Such a mode of conduct, if right upon general principles, appeared to me peculiarly called for by the circumflances under which we were affembled; and by the ambiguity with which the causes of resorting for the first time to this prerogative were stated and defended.

The infurrections (it was faid) at Yarmouth, Shields, and other places, gave Ministers a legal right to act; and the general state of the country, independently of these insurrections, made it expedient for them to avail themselves of this right. In other words, insurrection was the pretext, the general state of the country the cause of the measure. Yet insurrection was the motive stated in the Proclamation; and the Act of Parliament enjoins the disclosure, not of the pretext, but of the cause: so that it appeared to be doubtful whether even the letter of the law had been obeyed; but if it had, to this mode of professing one motive and acting upon another, however agreeable to the habits of tome men, I thought it my duty to distinct the House of Commons from giving any function or countenance whatever.

In a prudential view, furely information ought to precede judgment; and we were bound to know what really was the state of the country, before we delivered our opinion of it in the Addrefs. Whenever the House is called upon to declare an opinion of this nature, the weight which ought to belong to fuch a declaration, makes it highly important that it should be founded on the most authentic information, and that it should be clear and diffinct. Did the House mean to approve the measure taken by Administration, upon the ground of the public pretence of infurrections? It to, they were bound to have before them the facts relative to those insurrections, to the production of which no objection could be stated. Did they mean by their Address to declare that the general fituation of the country was in itself a juftification of what had been done? Upon this fupposition, it appeared to me equally necessary for them to to inform themselves, as to enable them to thate with precition to the public the circumnances in this fituation to which they particularly . Iverted. If they faw reason to fear impending tumules B was imminent and pressing, the measures of His Majesty's Ministers might be well enough adapted to such an exigency; but surely the evidence of such a danger was capable of being submitted either to the House or to a Secret Committee; and of its existence without such evidence, no man could think it becoming for such a body as the House of Commons to declare their belief.

If therefore the Address was to be founded upon either of the suppositions above stated, a previous enquiry was absolutely necessary. But there were fome whose apprehensions were directed not so much to any infurrections, either actually existing or immediately impending, as to the progress of what are called French opinions, propagated (as is supposed) with industry, and encouraged by fuccess; and to the mischiess which might in future time arise from the spirit of disobedience and disorder, which these doctrines are calculated to inspire. This danger, they said, was too notorious to require proof; its reality could better be afcertained by the separate observations of individual members, than by any proceeding which the House could institute in its collective capacity; and upon this ground, therefore, the Address might be fafely voted, without any previous enquiry.

To have laid any ground for approving without examination, was a great point gained for those who wished to appland the conduct of Administration; but in this instance I fear the foundation has been laid, without due regard to the nature of the Superstructure, which it is intended to support; for, if the danger confift in false but feducing theories, and our apprehensions be concerning what fuch theories may in process of time produce, to fuch an evil it is difficult to conceive how any of the meafures which have been purfued are in any degree applicable. Opinions must have taken the shape of overt acts, before they can be refuled by the fortifications in the Tower; and the fudden embodying of the militia and the drawing of the regular troops to the capital, feem to me meafures calculated to meet an immediate not a diffant mischief.

Impressed with these ideas, I could no more vote upon this last vague reason, than upon those of a more definite nature; since, if in one case the premises wanted proof, in the other, where proof was said to be superstuous, the conclusion was not just. If the majority of the House thought differently from me, and if this last ground of general apprehension of suture evils (the only one of all that were stated, upon which it could, with any colour of reason, be pretended that evidence dence was not both practicable and necessary), appeared to them to justify the measures of Government; then I say they ought to have declared explicitly the true meaning of their vote, and either to have disclaimed distinctly any belief in those impending tumults and insurrections, which had filled the minds of so many thousands of our fellow subjects with the most anxious apprehensions; or to have commenced an enquiry concerning them, the result of which would have enabled the House to lay before the public a true and authentic state of the nation, to put us upon our guard against real perils, and to dissipate chimerical alarms.

I am aware that there were some persons who thought that to be upon our guard was so much our first interest, in the present posture of assairs, that even to conceal the truth was less mischievous than to diminish the public terror. They dreaded inquiry, less it should produce light; they selt so strongly the advantage of obscurity in inspiring terror, that they overlooked its other property of causing real peril. They were so alive to the dangers belonging to salse security, that they were insensible to those arising from groundless alarms.—In this strame of mind they might for a moment forget that integrity and sincerity which ought ever to be the characteristic virtues of a British House of Comarons; and while they were compelled to admit that the House could not, without inquiry, profess its belief of dangers, which (if true) might be substantiated by evidence, they might nevertheless be unwilling that the salutary alarm (for such they deemed it) arising from these supposed dangers in the minds of the people, should be wholly quieted. What they did not themselves credit, they might with to be believed by others. Dangers, which they considered as distant, they were not displeased that the public should suppose near, in order to excite more vigorous exertions.

To these systems of crooked policy and pious fraud I have always entertained a kind of inflinetive and invincible repugnance; and, if I had nothing elie to advance in defence of my conduct but this feeling, of which I cannot divest myself, I should be far from fearing your displeasure But are there, in truth, no evils in a falie alarm, befides the diffrace attending those who are concerned in propagating it? Is it nothing to destroy peace, harmony, and confidence, among all ranks of citizens? Is it nothing to give a general ciedit and countenance to fulpicions, which every man may point as his worst passions incline him? In such a state, all political animotities are inflamed, We confound the miftaken speculatift with the detperate incendiary. We extend the preindia is judices which we have conceived against individuals to the political party or even to the religious sect of which they are members. In this spirit a Judge declared from the bench, in the last century, that poisoning was a Popish trick, and I should not be surprised if Bishops were now to preach from the pulpit that sedition is a Presbyterian or a Unitarian vice. Those who differ from us in their ideas of the constitution, in this paroxysm of alarm, we consider as consederated to destroy it. Forbearance and toleration have no place in our minds; for who can tolerate opinions, which, according to what the deluders teach, and rage and fear incline the deluded to believe, attack our Lives, our Properties, and our Religion?

This fituation I thought it my duty, if possible, to avert, by promoting an inquiry. By this measure the guilty, if such there are, would not have been detected, and the innocent liberated from suspicion.

My proposal was rejected by a great majority. I differ with all due respect to their opinion, but retain my own.

My next motion was for the infertion of the following words into the Address:—" Trusting "your Majesty will employ every means of ne"gociation gociation, confittent with the honour and fafety of this country, to avert the calamities of war."

My motive in this inflance is too obvious to require explanation; and I think it the lefs necesfary to dwell much on this subject, because with reipect to the defirableness of peace at all times, and more particularly in the pretent, I have reason to believe that your fentiments do not differ from mine. If we looked to the country where the caute of war was faid principally to originate, the fituation of the United Provinces appeared to me to turnilh abundance of prudential arguments in fayour of peace. If we looked to Ireland, I faw nothing there that would not discourage a wife statesman from putting the connexion between the two kingdoms to any unnecessary hazard. At home, if it be true that there are feeds of discontent, war is the hot-bed in which these seeds will soonest vegetate; and of all wars, in this point of view, that war is most to be dreaded, in the cause of which Kings may be supposed to be more concerned than their subjects.

I wished, therefore, most earnestly for peace; and experience had taught me, that the voice even of a Minority in the House of Commons, might not be wholly without effect, in deterring the King's Ministers Ministers from irrational projects of war. Even upon this occasion, if I had been more supported, I am persuaded our chance of preserving the blessings of peace would be better than it appears to be at present.

I come now to my third motion, "That an " humble address be presented to his Majesty; " that his Majesty will be graciously pleased to give " directions, that a Minister may be sent to Paris. " to treat with those persons who exercise provi-" fionally the functions of executive government " in France, touching fuch points as may be in " discussion between his Majesty and his Allies " and the French nation;" which, if I am rightly informed, is that which has been most generally disapproved. It was made upon mature confideration, after much deliberation with myfelf, and much confultation with others; and notwithstanding the various mifrepresentations of my motives in making it, and the misconceptions of its tendency, which have prepoffested many against it, I cannot repent of an act, which, if I had omitted, I should think myfelf deficient in the duty which I owe to you, and to my country at large.

The motives which urged me to make it were, the same desire of peace which actuated me in the former motion, if it could be preserved on homourable usuable terms, and if this were possible, an anxias with that the grounds of war might be just, lear, and intelligible.

If we er our ally have fuffered injury or infult, it the independence of Europe be menaced by inordinate and fuccefsfulambition, I know no means of preferving peace but by obtaining reparation for the injury, fatisfaction for the infult, or fecuricy against the defign, which we apprehend; and I know no means of obtaining any of these objects but by addressing ourselves to the Power of whom we complain.

If the exclutive navigation of the Scheldt, or any other right belonging to the States General, ms been invaded, the French Executive Council ne the invaders, and of them we must ask redrefs. If the rights of neutral nations have been attacked by the decree of the 19th of November, the National Convention of France have attacked them, and from that Convention, through the organ by which they speak to foreign courts and nations, their Minister for foreign affairs, we must demand explanation, difavowal, or such other fatisfaction as the case may require. If the manper in which the fame Convention have received and answered some of our countrymen, who have add fild them to thought worthy notice, precilely cifely of the same persons, and in the same manner, must we demand satisfaction upon that head also. If the security of Europe, by any conquests made or comprehended, be endangered to such a degree as to warrant us, on the principles as well of justice as of policy, to ensorce by arms a restitution of conquests already made, or a renunciation of such as may have been projected, from the Executive Power of France, in this instance again, must we ask such restitution, or such renunciation.

Howall, or any of these objects could be attained, but by negotiation, carried on by authorifed Minifters. I could not conceive. I knew indeed that there were fome persons whose notions of dignity were far different from mine, and who, in that point of view, would have preferred a clandeftine, to an avowed negotiation; but I confess I thought this mode of proceeding neither honourable nor fafe; and, with regard to fome of our complaints, wholly impracticable.—Not honourable, because, to feek private and circuitous channels of communication, feems to fuit the conduct, rather of fuch as fue for a favour, than of a great nation, which demands satisfaction. Not safe, because neither a declaration from an unauthorifed agent, nor a mere gratuitous repeal of the decrees complained of, (and what more could fuch a negotiation aim at?) would afford any fecurity against the revival or the claims which we oppose; and, lastly, impracticable with respect to that part of the quettion, which regards the fecurity of Europe, because such security could not be provided for by the repeal of a decree, or any thing that might be the refult of a private negotiation, but could only be obtained by a formal treaty to which the existing French government must of necessity be a partyl and I know no means by which it can become, a party to fuch a treaty, or to any treaty at all; but by a minuter publicly authorifed, and publicly received. Upon these grounds, and with these views, as a fincere friend to the peace, I thought it my duty to fuggest, what appeared to me, on every supposition, the most eligible, and if cersain points were to be infifted upon, the only means of preferring that invaluable blefling.

But I had fill a further motive: and if peace could not be preferved, I confidered the measure which I recommended as highly uteful in another point of view. To declare war, is, by the conflitution, the prerogative of the King; but to grant or with hold the means of carrying it on, is (by the fame conflitution) the privilege of the People, through their Representatives; and upon the people at large, by a law paramount to all Conflitutions—the Law of Nature and Necessity, must fall the burdens and functions, which are the too fure attendants upon that calamity. It feems therefore reasonable that they, who are to pay, and to fuffer, should be distinctly informed of the object for which war is made, and I conceived nothing would tend to this information fo much as an avowed negotiation: because from the result of fuch a negotiation, and by no other means, could we, with any degree of certainty, learn how far the French were willing to fatisfy us in all, or any of the points, which have been publicly held forth as the grounds of complaint against them. If in one of thefe any fatisfactory explanations were given, we should all admit, provided our original grounds of complaint were just, that the war would be fo too:—in fome—we should know the specific fubjects upon which fatisfaction was refused, and have an opportunity of judging whether or not they were a rational ground of dispute:—if in all and a rupture were nevertheless to take place, we should know that the public pretences were not the real causes of the war.

C 2

In the last case which I have put, I should hope there is too much spirit in the people of Great Britian, to submit to take a part in a proceeding founded on deceit; and in either of the others, whether our cause were weak or strong, we should at all events escape that last of insamies, the suspicion of being a party to the Duke of Bruntwick's Manifestoes.*

Manifelioes*. But this is not all. Having aftertained the precife cause of war, we should learn the true road to peace; and if the cause so aftertained appeared adequate, then we should look for peace through war, by vigorous exertions and liberal supplies: it inadequate, the Constitution would furnish us abundance of means, as well through our representatives, as by our undoubted right to petition King and Parliament, of impressing his Majesty's Ministers with sentiments similar to our own, and of engaging them to compromise, or if necessary, to relinquish an object, in which we did not seel interest sufficient to compensate to us for the calamities and hazard of a war.

To these reasonings it appeared to me that they cally could object with confidency, who would go

† C

* I have heard that the Manifestoes are not to be considercless the acts of the Illustrious Prince whose name I have marrianel, and that the threats contained in them were never in, at to be carried into execution. I hear with great satisfaction wherever tends to palliate the Manifestoes themselves; and with null more any thing that tends to disconnect them from the name which is affixed to them, because the great akinities of the perion in question, his extraordinary gallantry, and there all, his mild and paternal government of his subjects, have long since impressed me with the highest respect for his characters and upon this account it gave me much content when I heard that he was engaged in an enterprise, where, according to my ideas, true glory could not be as a fixed. to war with France on account of internal concerns; and who would confider the re-establishment of the old, or at least some other form of government, as the fair object of the contest. Such persons might reasonably enough argue, that with those whom they are determined to destroy, it is useless to treat.

To arguements of this nature, however, I paid little attention; because the eccentric opinion upon which they are founded was expressly disavowed, both in the King's Speech and in the Addresses of the two Houses of Parliament: and it was an additional motive with me for making my motion, that, if fairly debated, it might be the occasion of bringing into free discussion that opinion, and of separating more distinctly those who maintained and acted upon it from others, who from different motives (whatever they might be) were distinctined to my proposal.

But if the objections of the violent party appeared to me extravagant, those of the more moderate seemed wholly unintelligible. Would they make and continue war, till they can force France to a counter-revolution? No; this they disclaim. What then is to be the termination of the war to which they would excite us? I answer considently, that it can be no other than a negotiation, upon the tame principles and with the same men as that which I recommend. I fay the same principles, because after war peace cannot be obtained but by treaty, and treaty necessarily implies the independency of the contracting parties. I tay the fame men, because, though they may be changed before the happy hour of reconciliation arrives, yet that change, upon the principles above stated, would be merely accidental, and in no wife a necessary preliminary to peace: for I cannot suppose that they who disclaim making war for a change, would yet think it right to continue it till a change; or, in other words, that the blood and treasure of this country should be expended in a hope that-not our efforts-but time and chance may produce a new government in France, with which it would be more agreeable to our Ministers to negotiate than with the prefent. And it is further to be observed, that the necessity of fuch a negotiation will not in any degree depend upon the faccels of our arms, fince the reciprocal recognition of the independency of contracting parties is equally necessary to those who exact and those who other facrifices for the purpose of peace. I forbear to put the case of id fireces, became to contemplate the situation to which we, and especially our ally, might in such an event be placed, is a task too pannul to be un-Pertaken but in a case of the last pecessity. Let us suppose therefore the skill and gallantry of our failors and foldiers to be crowned with a feries of uninterrupted victories, and those victories to lead us to the legitimate object of a just war, a fafe and honourable peace. The terms of fuch a peace (I am fuppofing that Great Brtain is to dictate them) may confift in fatisfaction, restitution, or even by way of indemnity to us or to others, in cession of territory on the part of France. Now that fuch fatisfaction may be honourable, it must be made by an avowed Minister; that such restitution or cession may be fafe or honourable, they must be made by an independent power, competent to make And thus our very fuccesses and victories will necessarily lead us to that measure of negotiation and recognition, which, from the diftorted shape in which passion and prejudice represent objects to the mind of man, has by some been confidered as an act of humiliation and ahasement.

I have reason to believe there are some who think my motion unexceptionable enough in itself, but ill-timed. The time was not in my choice. I had no opportunity of making it sooner; and, with a view to its operation respecting peace, I could not delay it. To me, who think that public intercourse with France, except during actual war, ought always to substiff, the first occasion occision that presented itself, after the interruption of that intercourse, seemed of course the proper moment for pressing its renewal. But let us examine the objections upon this head of Time in detail. They appeared to me to be principally Four—

ref. That by fending a Minister to Paris at that period, we should give some countenance to a proceeding, most unanimously, and most justly reprobated, in every country of Europe.

To this objection I need not, I think, give any other answer, than that it refts upon an opinion, that by fending a minister we pay some compliment, implying approbation, to the prince or state to whom we fend him; an opinion which, for the honour of this country, I must hope to be wholly erroneous. We had a Minister at Verfailles, when Costice was bought and enslaved. We had Minister

1)

*Since this was written, we have learned the fad cataltrophe of the proceeding to which I alluded. Those, however who feel the force of my argument, will perceive that it is not at all imparted by this revolting act of cruelty and injurtice. Indeed, if I were inclined to fee any connection between the two I die is, I should rather feel additional regret for the rejection of a morion which may be have afforded one chance we refrieventing an act concerning which (out of brance) I will ye ture to a firm, that there is not throughout Lange one flers at the German courts, at the time of the infamous partition of Poland. We have generally a refident Conful, who acts as a Minister to the piratical republic of Algiers; and we have more than once fent embassies to Emperors of Moroccorecking from the blood through which, by the murder of their nearest relations, they had waded to their thrones. In none of these instances was any sanction given by Great Britain to the transactions by which power had been acquired, or to the manner in which it had been exercised.

2dly. That a recognition might more properly take place at the end, and as the refult of a private communication, and (in the phrase used upon a former occasion) as the price of peace, than gratuitously at the outset of negotiation.

I cannot help fuspecting, that they who urge this objection have consounded the present case with the question, formerly so much agitated, of American Independence. In this view they appear to me wholly dissimilar—I pray to God that, in all other respects, they may prove equally so. To recognize the Thirteen States, was in effect to withdraw a claim of our own, and it might fairly enough be argued that we were entitled to some price or compensation for such a facrisce. Lyen upon that occasion, I was of opinion that a gratui-and proliminary acknowledgment of their old pendence was most combinant to the pain iples imaginarimity and policy; but in this include we have no facilities to make, for we have no claim; and the reasons for which the French must with an avowed official intercourse, can be only such as apply equally to the mutual interest of both notions, by affording more affectual means of presenting mislanderstandings, and securing peace.

I would further recommend to those who press this objection, to confider whether, if recognition be really a morifice on our part, the Ministry have and always made that facritice by continuing a hup in the commercial treaty as a treaty fill o force. Every contract must be at an end when the contracting parties have no Imper any exilence either in their own perion for by their reprefint the . After the tenth of Au ail the johti edeater of Louis XVI, who was the contract are porty in instructly occommonice, was completely innihilated. The only quattra therefore it. Whether the Executive Council of France did Indid a preparable the political power is annuunited. If we fix they dal not, the control me party he melbrior any policied existence The type comes nath and yold. If we feet the yold, the place being actually in landwied, ed. them is the presentatives, (for the time at least) of what was the Executive Government in France. In this character alone do they claim to be acknowledged, fince their very style describes them as a Provisional Executive Council and nothing else. If we would preserve our treaty we could not do less; by sending a Minister we should not do more*.

Dia property

3dly. That our Ambassador having been recalled, and no British Minister having resided at Paris, while the conduct of the French was inoffensive with respect to us and our ally, it would be mortifying to send one thither, just at the time when they began to give us cause of complaint.

Mortifying to whom? Not certainly to the House of Commons, who were not a party to the recall of Lord Gower, and who, if my advice were followed, would lose no time in replacing him. To the Ministers possibly; and if so, it ought

† I do not think it would have been mortifying even to them, because in consequence of the discussions which had arisen, a

*If my argument is satisfactory, I have proved that we have recognised the Executive Council; and it is notorious, that through the medium of Mr. Chauvelin we have negotiated with them. But although we have both negotiated and recognised, it would be dishonourable, it seems, to negotiate in such a manner as to imply recognition. How nice are the points upon which great businesses turn! how remote from vulgar apprehension.

ought to be a warning to the House, that it should not, by acting like the Ministers, lose the proper, that is, the first opportunity, and thereby throw extrinsic difficulties of its own creation in the way of a measure, in itself wise and falutary.

4thly. That by acting in the manner proposed we might give ground of offence to those powers, with whom, in case of war, it might be prudent form connection and alliance.

This objection requires examination. Is it meant that our treating with France in its prefent flate will offend the German Powers, by shewing them that our ground of quarrel is different from theirs. If this be so, and if we adhere to the principles which we have publicly stated, I am afraid we must either offend or deceive, and in such an alternative I trust the option is not difficult.

If it be faid, that though our original grounds of quarrel were different, yet we may, in return for the aid they may afford us in obtaining our objects, afful them in theirs of a counter-revolution, and enter into an offentive alliance for that purpose—I answer, that our having previously treated measure which had been before in different might become exposition, but as this point made no part of my confideration, I have not thought it incumbent upon me to argue it.

treated would be no impediment to fuch a measure But if it were, I freely confess that this confideration would have no influence with me; because fuch an alliance, for fuch a purpofe, I conceive to be the greatest calamity that can befal the British nation: for let us not attempt to deceive ourselves; whatever possibility or even probability there may be of a counter-revolution, from internal agitation and difcord, the means of producing fuch an event by external force, can be no other than the conquest of France. The conquest of France!!! O! calumniated crusaders, how rational and moderate were your objects!-O! much injured Louis Lupon what flight grounds have vou been accufed of refiles and immoderate ambition!-O! tame and feeble Cervantes, with what a timid pencil and faint colours have you painted the portrait of a difordered imagination!

I have now stated to you fully, and I trust fairly, the arguments that persuaded me to the course of conduct which I have pursued. In these consists my defence, upon which you are to pronounce: and I hope I shall not be thought presumptuous, when I say, that I expect with considence a favourable verdict.

If the reasonings which I have adduced sail of convincing you, I confess indeed that I shall be disappointed.

array, and, because to my unitable demand a approach have more of interpolate in political disordines; but even in this case, it you be in them probability fufficient to induce you to believe that, though a stirring enough to convince you, they, and not say finisher or oblique motives, did in not a state or. I have fill gained my cause; for another to perfect the propriety of my conduct may be doubted, the rectifude of my interpolate manages admitted.

Ken the other the justice and candour of the arism. It is wished I have appealed, I wait your decail in the sout few—Your approbation I anxiously lettre, but your acquired I confidently expect.

Find the my supposed talk induct by some of a policy of a problem, and are by others, attack-the data are as a small by mix enemies,—to you be even a constant of a rate of and protection; and constant, the rate of the financial from my duty. I should be a record of any conduct. I should involve and that loss that in a miximity to the maximum with the constant of the conduct of the city.

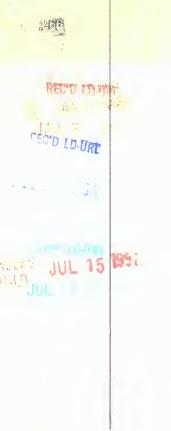

god in the control of pay, and which is in the little

( J. 11) s

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY Los Angeles

This book is DUE on the last date stamped below.

orm L9-40m-7,'56(C790s4)444

AA 000 098 858 :

